Parents attend class on "Spiritual Warfare"

by Mary Lou Bytof

Can parents and teachers identify youngsters who may be either dabbling in the occult and/or practicing satanic rituals?

The answer is "yes", according to Mike True, the creator of a course entitled "Spiritual Warfare."

On Monday, evening in Northern High School, True addressed a group of approximately 70 parents. True had spoken to Northern teachers at an in-service program several weeks ago.

He recognized that the large turnout was probably due to the teenage vigilante incident of last month. The teens, armed with guns and homemade bombs, had set out to ambush an alleged satanic ritual.

The Dillsburg Police Department took the teens into custody. No sign of a ritual was discovered that evening.

After giving a chilling historical background on satanism from ancient to modern times, True proceeded to explain the characteristics of teens who may be dabbling in the evil rituals.

"Tell your children that you will enter their bedrooms," True emphasized. "Don't wait until it is too late, he warned."

Although the following items and behaviors are common to satanists and dabblers in the occult, True warned parents not to panic if only a single isolated factor is present. For example, the popular peace symbol of the 70's is coming back, he said. But satanists use it to mean turmoil, he explained.

"Satanism is a religion that is antithetical to Christianity," True said. And its practitioners pervert the symbols of Christianity. Other satanic symbols include the pentagram, swastika, and circles, he said. These and other symbols may be displayed on the body, especially on the hand, on clothing, in writing, and on room decor, he said. True asked parents to watch for a Book of Shadows, which he said is "a notebook in which they write down rituals, violent song lyrics, satanic symbols and suicide notes." It usually has a black cover, he added.

Black clothing may be either a teenage fad or a satanic symbol. Again, True warned about isolated factors.

If in addition to wearing black, a male teen replaces posters of race cars and bikini-clad girls with pictures of demons, heavy metal rock groups, and sculptures of skulls and bones, a parent should be suspicious, he said.

Cults lure naive teens with drugs and sex, he said. Remember, Satanism has no rules or restrictions, he told the parents.

"Drugs are almost always included in Satanism," True emphasized.

Along with drug use comes a drop in grades, an angry and aggressive personality, rebellion, and destruction, he said. The youngster, often an intelligent underachiever who is bored with life, pulls away from family and activities. He associates with the "wrong crowd" and is withdrawn, he concluded.

Those who are heavily into satanism may use a code language—often an obsolete language, morse code, or even Braille. "Remember, they don't want you to know what is going on," he explained. Some even take on satanic names. They listen to heavy metal rock music with violent lyrics. Some may have self-inflicted cuts on their arms and hands. They may mutilate animals, he added.

"If they are involved in animal sacrifice, I fear for them," he exclaimed. "It means they'll become desensitized to violence." "Satanism involves the destruction of all forms of innocence and authority," True said.

The following, according to True, are some reasons why teens become involved with the occult:

- Thirst for power and secret knowledge
- Curiosity
- Peer pressure and need for acceptance
- Rebellion
- Hopelessness

A bike hike to raise money for MS was held last Sunday. Approximately 75-100 bikers rode the ten mile trek through the Dillsburg countryside. The bike hike was sponsored by the Dillsburg Lions.

These teens often come from dysfunctional families, he said. There may be drug abuse, alcoholism and a long-standing lack of communication, he said.

"If children have never been able to express their joys and fears with their parents and siblings," True said, "they will do it elsewhere."

"I'm a firm believer that what you put into your minds... will come out," he said.

Slasher movies desensitize children to violence, he warned. Fantasy games, in the wrong hands, are also a problem, he said. The fantasy game Dungeons and Dragons' manual includes wording almost directly from occult books, he said.

Involvement in satanism is "a multifaceted, multidimensional problem," True said. It is a "disease" of the spirit, the soul, and the body, he said.

To help a youngster who may be dabbling in satanism, a parent first must stop pretending that it does not exist.

"If you see a number of things recurring, check it out. Investigate rumors and notify the police," he added.

Keep the lines of communication open, he urged. Talk with your teen's teachers. What does he or she write about in English class? What does he or she create in art class?

"Lastly—and most importantly—if you have faith in God, you need to pray," True concluded.

Mike True is the assistant to the president at the Evangelical School of Technology in Meyersstown. He is a 1979 graduate of the Lancaster Bible College, and holds a master of divinity degree.

In his younger years, he had experimented in the occult via telepathy and out-of-body experiences.

The program was sponsored by the Northern Parent Advisory Committee (PAC).
